The Chelsea Police Department and the MIT Center for Athletics and Transformative Values co-hosted an innovative program aimed at creating a new police training program to help empathy and compassion into implicit bias training programs.

As part of an ongoing relationship between the MIT Center that was formed to form the Innovative Citizenship Hub model, both organizations brought the program to the Chelsea Police and other four police departments for six weeks of training in how to add new tools to keep escalations from escalating on the street – and to take police departments into more of a community service and safeguarding.

In a period where the public is exercised, whether warranted or not. Many times, men and women who have made a pledge to protect fellow residents feel that the world is against them regardless of the outcome. This presents a real danger both in regards to mental health and also with any use of force.

Tenzin said confidence in policing in the U.S., both perceived and real, is putting additional stressors on the very people that are depended on for public safety. Often, police officers internalize the public criticism that erupts whenever there is an event where use of force is exercised, whether warranted or not. Many times, men and women who have made a pledge to protect fellow residents feel that the world is against them regardless of the outcome. This presents a real danger both in regards to mental health and also with any use of force.

The Chelsea Police Department and the MIT Center for Athletics and Transformative Values co-hosted an innovative program aimed at creating a new police training program to help empathy and compassion into implicit bias training programs.

As part of an ongoing relationship between the MIT Center that was formed to form the Innovative Citizenship Hub model, both organizations brought the program to the Chelsea Police and other four police departments for six weeks of training in how to add new tools to keep escalations from escalating on the street – and to take police departments into more of a community service and safeguarding.

In a period where the public is exercised, whether warranted or not. Many times, men and women who have made a pledge to protect fellow residents feel that the world is against them regardless of the outcome. This presents a real danger both in regards to mental health and also with any use of force.

Tenzin said confidence in policing in the U.S., both perceived and real, is putting additional stressors on the very people that are depended on for public safety. Often, police officers internalize the public criticism that erupts whenever there is an event where use of force is exercised, whether warranted or not. Many times, men and women who have made a pledge to protect fellow residents feel that the world is against them regardless of the outcome. This presents a real danger both in regards to mental health and also with any use of force.

The Chelsea Police Department and the MIT Center for Athletics and Transformative Values co-hosted an innovative program aimed at creating a new police training program to help empathy and compassion into implicit bias training programs.

As part of an ongoing relationship between the MIT Center that was formed to form the Innovative Citizenship Hub model, both organizations brought the program to the Chelsea Police and other four police departments for six weeks of training in how to add new tools to keep escalations from escalating on the street – and to take police departments into more of a community service and safeguarding.

In a period where the public is exercised, whether warranted or not. Many times, men and women who have made a pledge to protect fellow residents feel that the world is against them regardless of the outcome. This presents a real danger both in regards to mental health and also with any use of force.

Tenzin said confidence in policing in the U.S., both perceived and real, is putting additional stressors on the very people that are depended on for public safety. Often, police officers internalize the public criticism that erupts whenever there is an event where use of force is exercised, whether warranted or not. Many times, men and women who have made a pledge to protect fellow residents feel that the world is against them regardless of the outcome. This presents a real danger both in regards to mental health and also with any use of force.

The Chelsea Police Department and the MIT Center for Athletics and Transformative Values co-hosted an innovative program aimed at creating a new police training program to help empathy and compassion into implicit bias training programs.

As part of an ongoing relationship between the MIT Center that was formed to form the Innovative Citizenship Hub model, both organizations brought the program to the Chelsea Police and other four police departments for six weeks of training in how to add new tools to keep escalations from escalating on the street – and to take police departments into more of a community service and safeguarding.

In a period where the public is exercised, whether warranted or not. Many times, men and women who have made a pledge to protect fellow residents feel that the world is against them regardless of the outcome. This presents a real danger both in regards to mental health and also with any use of force.

Tenzin said confidence in policing in the U.S., both perceived and real, is putting additional stressors on the very people that are depended on for public safety. Often, police officers internalize the public criticism that erupts whenever there is an event where use of force is exercised, whether warranted or not. Many times, men and women who have made a pledge to protect fellow residents feel that the world is against them regardless of the outcome. This presents a real danger both in regards to mental health and also with any use of force.

The Chelsea Police Department and the MIT Center for Athletics and Transformative Values co-hosted an innovative program aimed at creating a new police training program to help empathy and compassion into implicit bias training programs.

As part of an ongoing relationship between the MIT Center that was formed to form the Innovative Citizenship Hub model, both organizations brought the program to the Chelsea Police and other four police departments for six weeks of training in how to add new tools to keep escalations from escalating on the street – and to take police departments into more of a community service and safeguarding.

In a period where the public is exercised, whether warranted or not. Many times, men and women who have made a pledge to protect fellow residents feel that the world is against them regardless of the outcome. This presents a real danger both in regards to mental health and also with any use of force.

Tenzin said confidence in policing in the U.S., both perceived and real, is putting additional stressors on the very people that are depended on for public safety. Often, police officers internalize the public criticism that erupts whenever there is an event where use of force is exercised, whether warranted or not. Many times, men and women who have made a pledge to protect fellow residents feel that the world is against them regardless of the outcome. This presents a real danger both in regards to mental health and also with any use of force.

The Chelsea Police Department and the MIT Center for Athletics and Transformative Values co-hosted an innovative program aimed at creating a new police training program to help empathy and compassion into implicit bias training programs.

As part of an ongoing relationship between the MIT Center that was formed to form the Innovative Citizenship Hub model, both organizations brought the program to the Chelsea Police and other four police departments for six weeks of training in how to add new tools to keep escalations from escalating on the street – and to take police departments into more of a community service and safeguarding.

In a period where the public is exercised, whether warranted or not. Many times, men and women who have made a pledge to protect fellow residents feel that the world is against them regardless of the outcome. This presents a real danger both in regards to mental health and also with any use of force.